Province Advances Work on Offshore Wind Road Map

The Province has released the second module of the offshore wind road map, which lays out its plan to develop a robust supply chain for the emerging sector.

"A strong, local supply chain and robust infrastructure are critical to the successful development of an offshore wind sector," said Tory Rushton, Minister of Natural Resources and Renewables. "Wind speeds off Nova Scotia are world class, rivaling even the winds of the North Sea where the offshore wind sector started. We're poised to leverage our strengths, including our expertise, infrastructure and our strategic location, to become a leader in the offshore wind market in partnership with all interested parties."

Module 2 outlines the government's plan to build the solid foundational pieces needed for the offshore wind industry supply chain. This includes planning and developing ports, helping businesses and communities prepare to participate in the industry, and training an essential, varied workforce. The offshore wind market is experiencing rapid growth throughout the world, so building Nova Scotia's supply chain is necessary to avoid bottlenecks and ensure growth.

The Province's strategy to develop a best-in-class supply chain includes: examining existing marine sector supply chains and emphasizing Nova Scotia's strengths, assessing gaps and analyzing future needs; ensuring equitable access to opportunities in the industry among First Nations, African Nova Scotian businesses and other underrepresented and underserved groups; preparing infrastructure for future industry needs and ensuring regulatory coordination and efficiency for suppliers.

The third and final module of the offshore wind road map will be released next year and will focus on feedback from the Mi'kmaq of Nova Scotia, fishers, environmental organizations, academia, communities, industry, the research community, ocean users and other interested parties. Module 3 will also consider input gathered through the federal-provincial regional assessment on offshore wind development, which is expected to be completed in early 2025. Engagement will continue after the third module and throughout the life cycle of the offshore wind industry.
