More Funding at Dalhousie Centre for Psychological Health

The Dalhousie Centre for Psychological Health will continue to welcome students and provide publicly funded clinical services to vulnerable Nova Scotians. Over the next three years, the Province is investing $6.2 million, including extending the clinical psychology residency program for another two years.

The centre, in Halifax, is a teaching clinic that offers psychological care at no cost to clients who face barriers to support, including people with low income. It works closely with the Dalhousie School of Social Work Community Clinic, where social workers help clients with essential needs, including accessing resources and navigating systems.

Funding the Dalhousie Centre for Psychological Health is part of the government's work to provide Nova Scotians with universal access to mental healthcare by reducing barriers, increasing access points and attracting skilled professionals to deliver the publicly funded mental health services Nova Scotians need.

Geological Data More Accessible to Mining Industry

Nova Scotia is making geological data more accessible to the mining industry. The Province has signed a memorandum of understanding with Natural Resources Canada to participate in the Canadian Digital Core Library. The initiative will digitize hundreds of thousands of metres of physical drill core samples into standardized, accessible digital datasets that will be publicly available.

"Our mining industry creates good-paying jobs across rural Nova Scotia, strengthening our communities and economy," said Tory Rushton, Minister of Natural Resources. "We are excited to participate in the Canadian Digital Core Library, which will make it easier for investors to see the potential that Nova Scotia holds for the mining industry."

The Canadian Digital Core Library will allow geoscientists, industry representatives and potential investors to more easily analyze subsurface geology. It will support more efficient mineral and energy exploration, reduce duplication of efforts and promote data-driven decision making.

Lab Results Now Available Sooner

Nova Scotians will be able to access some lab test results through the YourHealthNS app within 24 hours of processing, down from the previous seven days. The change, effective June 25, supports the Province's ongoing efforts to improve access to digital health services and brings Nova Scotia in line with other Canadian jurisdictions.

The change applies only to lab test results available through YourHealthNS, mainly blood and urine tests. Diagnostic imaging reports available through the app will continue to be released 14 days after they have been verified.
